"I can't envision a situation in the state of Mississippi where the institution of marriage would be hurt as a result of homosexuals being afforded the right to marry," Sen. Lizbeth Benacquisto, R-Dyer, said in the debate over the bill, Mississippi Senate Bill 2618, which prohibits legal recognition of same-sex unions. "I can't see any harm to society or to children being born when we allow people who are in sexual relationships to be married," she added. The 2012 Mississippi Constitution bans same-sex marriage, but the Mississippi Supreme Court in 2013 declared the ban unconstitutional. The court has yet to rule on whether to take up any state-level legal challenges to overturn the court's decision. The state of Mississippi passed its first same-sex marriage ban, the Constitutionally Protected Marriage Amendment, in 2004. The amendment required two-thirds of the state Legislature to pass before a popular referendum could amend the state Constitution. The amendment is being challenged in U.S. District Court. The Legislature failed to get a two-thirds vote for the amendment in 2007 and 2010, but the Legislature still passed an amendment banning same-sex marriage in 2011. Despite that history, Benacquisto said she still believes marriage should only be between a man and a woman. "The state of Mississippi does recognize marriage as between a man and a woman, and that is part of the beauty of our state," she said. When asked by committee Chairman Terry Burton, D-Mississippi City, if her answer also applied to the states of Missouri and Georgia – both of which also have bans on same-sex marriage – she replied in the affirmative. The same-sex marriage bill, which passed the Senate on a 22-16 vote, would allow legal recognition of marriages for same-sex couples and make it illegal for states and localities to refuse to recognize those unions. The bill passed the House by a 93-44 vote. The bill would extend the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples

Category:Windows-only softwareQ: SQL Server 2005 Data Architecture We have a database with some hundred tables. Most of them have a 20k-40k records. The average length of an ID field (int) is between 3 and 8. I know that a table scan will take a lot of time, and I'm trying to avoid it. My first step was to create indexes for all the tables, on ID fields. Not all of them are clustered. Most of them are Heap tables, but I turned also some of them into Clustered tables. At this point I started to drop these indexes. Clustered index is 5 times faster than a Heap table, but probably I'm going to speed it up with merge? What should I do? The average time of each query is about 5-6 seconds (and it is only one query) The SQL Server version is 2005 Thanks in advance. A: I'm not exactly sure how "Heap" indexes work. If I understand you correctly, each row in the index is the same size as a row in the table, then you need to set a heap size that is larger than the average row size. The extra size serves as a way of speeding up the index access. If this is the case, then you've already gone a long way towards speeding up access. I would recommend to double check that all of the indexes are being used and that you aren't creating performance issues in other areas of the SQL Server instance. Q: Adding class to an element inside a container doesn't work I have this code: Lorem ipsum dolor sit amet You can see it in this JSFiddle. I have some jQuery code which adds a class to the tag, but that doesn't seem to work. What am I doing wrong? S("".col-md-12").find("p").addClass("green"); A: You have to specify a position, in your 3da54e8ca3
