You can use the instructions in this article to install the latest GCC version on Linux, regardless of the system you are using. This article is a follow-up to the article about how to install gcc using gcc-multilib, which explains how to install multiple versions of GCC. The gcc-multilib package provides several headers and libraries to give users a range of versions of gcc to choose from, provided by the same installer. The package provides C, C++, Java, Fortran, Fortran 77, Objective-C, Objective-C++, and C++ bindings. The most recent version of gcc can be obtained from the gcc-latest package, which provides a recent release of gcc, including this guide. To obtain the latest version of gcc-multilib, run the command: # rpm -Uvh gcc-multilib-* The gcc-4.3-multilib package provides C, C++, Objective-C, Objective-C++, and Objective-C bindings, and the gcc-4.3-fortran-* package provides Fortran bindings. The gcc-4.3-* and gcc-4.3-multilib packages provide older versions of gcc. Installing gcc-4.3-multilib Installing gcc-4.3-multilib or gcc-4.3-* will depend on the platform you are installing on. First, you will have to enter the full version of gcc-4.3-multilib you want to install: # rpm -i gcc-4.3-multilib-* The package will then download and install a range of files. Depending on your system, the files it installs may include the following: /usr/bin/gcc /usr/bin/gcc-4.3 /usr/share/info/gcc-4.3.html /usr/share/info/gcc-4.3.0.html /usr/share/info/09e8f5149f
